

Barak Obama

Barack Obama was born on August 4, 1961, in Hawaii. His mother, Ann Dunham, was from Kansas, while his father, Barack Obama Sr., came from Kenya.

They met while studying at the University of Hawaii. Barack's father returned to Kenya when Barack was very young, leaving him with his mother. His parents' separation shaped his childhood, as he grew up with questions about identity and belonging.

When he was just six years old, his mother remarried. Barack's family moved to Indonesia, where he experienced a new culture and saw poverty around him.

Living in Indonesia opened his eyes to the world beyond the United States. His mother emphasized the importance of education, teaching him to read and learn about the world.

By the age of ten, Barack returned to Hawaii to live with his grandparents. They sent him to a good school, but he often felt like an outsider. He struggled to find where he fit in, dealing with questions about race and identity.

Even though he was in a diverse environment, he faced challenges as a young Black boy in a mostly white school.

As he grew up, Barack started to feel the impact of not having a close relationship with his father. He would only see him once more before his father's death.

This loss was painful for him, yet it gave him a sense of purpose. He began to focus on what he could do to make a difference, even though he still wasn't sure what path to take.

After high school, he attended Occidental College in Los Angeles.

There, he began to explore the world of activism and social change. He saw injustices and wanted to help make things better for others.

It was a time when he began to see how he could use his voice to speak up for what was right.

Barack later transferred to Columbia University in New York City. He studied political science and learned more about how government works.

Life in New York was tough, and he struggled with feelings of isolation.

However, he kept pushing himself, determined to understand how he could help others.

After graduating, Barack moved to Chicago. He worked as a community organizer, helping people in poor neighborhoods. His job was to help people who felt like they had no voice.

This work showed him the importance of being there for others, listening to them, and standing up for their rights.

Being a community organizer wasn't easy. He faced many challenges, like low pay and tough conditions. But Barack didn't give up.

He believed in what he was doing, and he knew that small changes could lead to bigger ones. People in the community saw how much he cared, and they started to trust him.

Barack wanted to make an even bigger impact, so he decided to go to law school. He was accepted to Harvard Law School, one of the top schools in the world.

While there, he became the first Black president of the prestigious Harvard Law Review. This achievement gained him respect and recognition, but he never forgot his roots.

When he returned to Chicago, he continued to help people. He worked as a lawyer for civil rights cases and taught law at the University of Chicago.
